

The Demon Living in my Shed

By Lucia Lorenz

I have befriended the demon that lives in my bright blue shed outside my house.

I sometimes bring it food and sardines, because I hate sardines. They stink up the house anyway, so it is better for them to be out there with it.

The first time I met the demon, I was on my way to put the lawnmower back in the shed after freshly cutting the grass. I remember I had a bright red Kool-Aid stain on my yellow shirt. Anyway, when I saw the demon there, it told me the grass looked good, and I decided to give it my shed to live in. It agreed.

Sometimes I go out there to pet it and play games. So far we have only played rummy, and I have rubbed its back. I plan on teaching it how to play Texas hold'em once I learn how to play, of course. I think the demon would enjoy it more than rummy.

I let it into my house to play the other day. I showed it my all-pink kitchen and offered to make it nachos, but it denied me once it saw the picture frame in my living room. The one with my sticky friend in it.

It possibly ate a bunny the other day. I cannot think of what else those bones would be, since they were so tiny, just lying outside the shed doors. I asked if it tasted good. It said better than the sardines. We both laughed.

The demon usually smelled like baloney on a hot summer day. I told it if it wanted any cologne I could give it some, but it refused, saying that I needed it more. Little did it know, I do not even use cologne.

Last night it kissed me. It was wet. I do not know if I hated it, but I sure did not like it. Oh well. I am sure it will not matter, because after that, the demon decided it would mow my lawn for me permanently now.

Isn't that great?

But I do not think I will visit it now. It did not ask me to come back anyway.
